Appears to be the distal end of a rapier or stiletto scabbard. The blade geometry away from the tip seems very square, unusually so. Rapier blades relied on a diamond-like cross section to give the thrusting tip strength. This also meant, however, that no part of the edge of the sword would have been sharp.

The scabbard appears to be a longitudinally split piece of wood. This was not common practice however, scabbards typically being made of cut pieces of wood.
